

"In our learning community we earned 6 credits by combining Art 101 and History 152. We learned how the cultural events that were occurring at a certain time influenced the art of that same time period. All in a challenging environment that encouraged us to ask questions."
— Reynolds student Edwin Radcliff

“Learning Communities take classes with two totally different subjects and brings them together. By bringing together art and history, I was able to study how the cultural events that were occurring during a certain time influenced the art of that time period.

Also having recently moved to Richmond, I enjoyed making some new friends.”

— Reynolds student Jessica Buckman

You'll discover common connections

Learning Communities give you an opportunity to take two or more related classes with students who share your common interests. You take classes together in small group settings in an interactive environment that encourages the free flow of ideas. And you are taught by a team of faculty who connect different subjects areas in a fun, creative and flexible setting.

“Both classes in my Learning Community can be used to satisfy core degree requirements in a college transfer program which was THE deciding factor in my decision to enroll. I work full time and have to make the most of my class time—the Learning Community was a neat way to meet my need, ” said Reynolds student, Christine Kroeger.

"As Learning Community faculty we work and communicate as a team. It is not only beneficial for the students in the "community," but also the teachers as we share ideas, work and have fun learning together."

— Wayne Knight, Reynolds faculty member
